ABSTRACT

This research uses political economy approach in viewing the rural development on food sector in Indonesia. This is a descriptive research. The problem in this research is that there is the fact that there are still many poor people in the villages although our country has been able to fulfill the need for food has done the national food self-support. This research also wants to discuss what kind of intervention model used by the government.

The research shows that from the point of view of the quantity, the food sector of rural development is successful. This is indicated by the success of our country in reaching the national food self-support since 1984. However, from the point of view of the quality ( the amount of income of the peasants ), it is not
